Move fast and keep your code quality

updated 9 months ago

What happens when you need to deliver something tomorrow but you know it won't be possible? Should you not create tests to move faster? Maybe don't do code reviews? Why wait for the CI to finish?

In this talk, I'll explore alternative ways to build software in a fast paced environment without destroying your code quality or the future of the project.

Plus, I'll share some best practices on team building that are directly related to approaching these issues.

One thing that most successful companies have in common is an amazing group of talented people who work well together. How do you get there? How can you, as an iOS developer, contribute to creating a great work environment and a supportive internal community, and still produce high-quality software in a fast paced manner?

I'll share my experience on being part of a team of iOS developers from all over the world. How do we keep moving fast while maintaining our code quality?

I hate public speaking. So why do I keep doing it?

The first reaction I get when I hear public speaking is panic. Every time I need to jump in the stage I feel it. Why do I keep doing it if it's so uncomfortable?

In this talk I'll not only try to answer that question, but also tackle some of the most common misunderstandings surrounding tech talks.

Is the speaker the most technically capable? Do they have a special knowledge about the topic they're discussing?

The best professionals I've worked with in my career have been great communicators. As with any skill, this needs to be trained.

The structure of the talk will be the following:

- Why do I speak in tech conferences?
- "I don't have anything interesting to say" and other lies.
- Why should you speak publicly?

"I don't know what to talk about"

TEACH WHEN YOU LEARN SOMETHING
